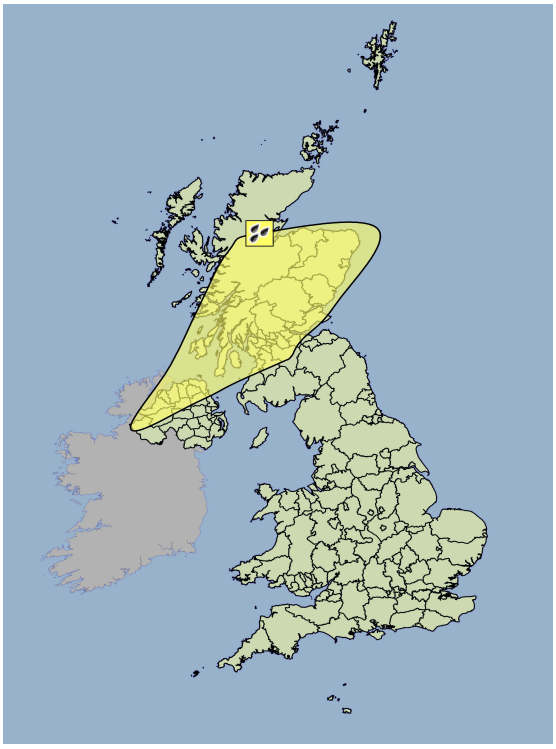
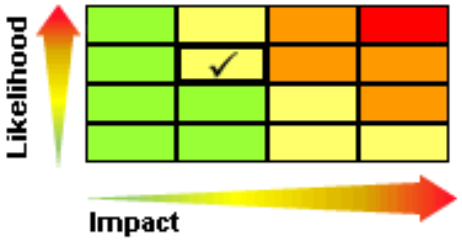
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A deepening area of low pressure will cross the northern half of the UK during Wednesday morning bringing a further period of heavy rain. As the system runs into colder air over Scotland there is the potential for some snow, mainly affecting higher ground of the north.

There is uncertainty over the exact track of the depression and therefore also where the heaviest rain will occur, as well as the extent of any snow. Therefore this warning may be updated closer to the time.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 00:05 on Wed, 27th Jan 2016 until 12:00 on Wed, 27th Jan 2016

Another area of heavy rain is expected to move northeast, reaching parts of Northern Ireland by midnight start of Wednesday, then across much of Scotland during the rest of the night into Wednesday morning. Snow is also expected to fall over high ground, mainly to the north of the Central Belt of Scotland, perhaps affecting lower levels for time. Drier conditions are expected to reach Northern Ireland soon after rush-hour and extend to much of Scotland by lunchtime.

Please be aware of the potential for difficult travel conditions on Wednesday morning, mainly from surface water on roads.

This warning has been updated to bring forward the start time forward.
